Dealing With Seasickness

What To Do When You Get That Queasy Feeling

(Shared from USPS Publications, Beth Schwab)

Seasickness occurs when your body's inner ear balance system reacts to the unfamiliar motion of the ship, causing an imbalance that leads to nausea. Seasickness often disappears after a few days, but waiting for it to go away can be miserable.

To avoid seasickness:

- *Do not go below decks for long, and when below, look out a porthole & gaze at the horizon
- *Do not look through binoculars for any length of time
- *Do not stare at objects your brain interprets as stable, such as a book, needlecraft or a compass

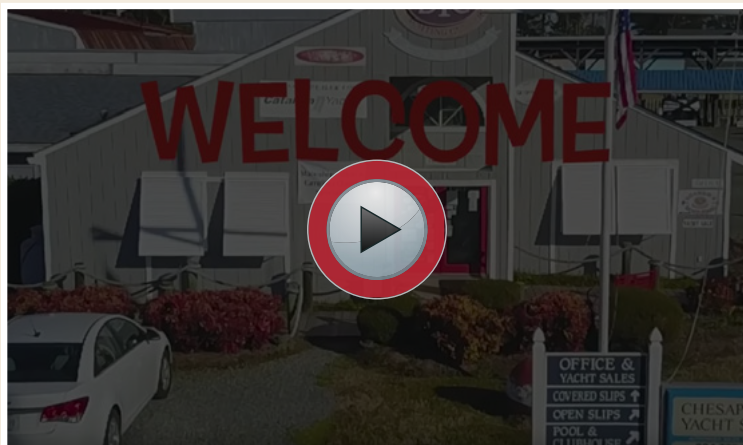

Avoiding seasickness isn't always possible, but try to stay on deck in the fresh air & focus on anything other than the boat's movement. Facing forward seems to help, along with taking deep breaths and drinking plenty of water. Eating bland foods in the beginning will keep the hunger at bay.

When nausea overtakes you, try the following:

- *Take Dramamine or Bonine, over the counter antihistamines that can make you sleepy
- *Prescription anti- nausea medicine is available
- *Fishermen often wear prescription Scopolamine patches behind their ears. Should be in place prior to setting sail & last 3 days.
- *Ginger, a natural herbal cure, comes in capsules, chews, chips & root. Be sure to get real ginger.
- *Wristbands that use acupressure combat nausea.

Before you shove off next time, try not to consume too much alcohol the night before, stay away from heavy meals & get a good night's sleep. ⚓
